Name reading at Vietnam Memorial gives Americans a chance to mourn

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Vietnam Veterans Memorial has helped heal a war-torn nation and inspire tributes to other victims of tragedy.

The 58,229 names of those killed or missing in the war from 1959 to 1975 — all inscribed in black granite — are being read aloud over four days to help mark the memorial's 20th anniversary.

Michael Milan's uncle, Army Pvt. George W. Milan of Atlantic City, N.J., is among all those names. His should be read sometime this weekend.

Pvt. Milan was 22 when he was killed. His death came before his nephew was born. The wall bearing his name went up when the younger Milan was only 9.

Still, Michael feels a connection to his uncle and the service he gave his country.

"This memorial makes it permanent, what they went through," Milan said. "As long as this wall is here, people know what these soldiers fought for. They will know what they died for."

The recitation of names is part of the healing process that designer Maya Lin envisioned when she sought to build a memorial that would separate the nation's political divisions over the war from the human loss that resulted.

Its V-shaped arms were intended to draw people together at a quiet spot that dips below ground level where, she hoped, people would grieve for the lost.

The past and present, Lin said, would meet on the shiny surface, where the chiseled names of the dead would mingle with the reflections of living visitors.

"This was something that gave Americans a license to mourn publicly," said Jan Scruggs, founder of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund that is sponsoring the anniversary events.

A concert Wednesday was followed Thursday by a ceremony that opened the name-reading at the memorial. That endeavor was expected to take hours over four days, ending at noon Sunday.

Veterans Day will be observed there a day later. The names form the structure's emotional centerpiece. Inscribed in chronological order of death, they make the war's cost personal.

The memorial has inspired the creation of others such as one across the Potomac to the victims of Sept. 11, 2001, attack on the Pentagon.
