Fails

The full autopsy report wasn't expected to be released until Wednesday.

Dr. Samuel Z. Goldhaber, an associate professor of medicine at the Harvard Medical School and the founder of Brigham and Women's Hospital Thromboembolism Service in Boston, told the Austin American-Statesman said any clotting that would occur in the calf after the kind of knee surgery Fails had would be minor and "rarely would they break off and go to the lungs."

Like all freshman players at A&M, Fails was given a complete physical before reporting for football practices Aug. 5.

Fails' roommate, freshman tight end Patrick Fleming, attended Colleyville Heritage High School in the Grapevine-Colleyville Independent School District last year with Fails.

Fails played in four games this season before undergoing the surgery.

"He likely would have started for us next year, and possibly would have been starting right now if not for the knee surgery," Slocum said.

Fails was voted Class 5A Defensive Player of the Year by Associated Press Sports Editors last season. He was a first-team All-State selection by the APSE and the Texas Sports Writers Association.

Fails had been granted a medical redshirt, Slocum said.

In his senior season, Fails registered 36 tackles and five sacks and forced three fumbles. In limited playing time this season, Fails was in on two tackles against Louisiana Tech. He also played against Baylor, Louisiana Tech and Virginia Tech.

In response, the University of Texas canceled its Monday night hex rally, a gathering traditionally held before the annual A&M-UT game that brings down a fictional witches' curse on the A&M football team. The rally was also cancelled after the 1999 Aggie Bonfire Collapse.

"Our hearts go out to the family and to the Texas A&M staff and players," UT head coach Mack Brown said in a statement. "There is nothing anybody can say. We understand their pain."

personnel who worked on similar projects as part of their job, he said. The stack was built in the middle of the driving range where irrigation pipes could keep the fires from getting out of hand.

The insurance concerns that plague attempts to build Bonfire on campus were not present at the club, since the crew is covered by workers' compensation, Goff said.

Cody Spivey, who led the crew of builders, said it took about a month to build the stack. In the four to five weeks they used to build it, the crew was only able to work about five hours per week.

Spivey said there were no safety problems encountered during construction.

"Every log is wired in three different places," he said.

Alph Wright, a resident of Kingwood and a former student from the Class of 1985, was teaching his son Aggie wildcats while the bonfire was burning.

Wright said Bonfire represents more than just tradition, it represents the desire to beat the University of Texas.

"(It's) not as good as the original," he said. "But it'll do."

Boston's Cardinal Law meets with Voice of the Faithful reform group

BOSTON (AP) — Roman Catholics from the lay reform group Voice of the Faithful met face-to-face with Cardinal Bernard Law for the first time Tuesday in an attempt to ease tensions that have simmered for months between the two sides.

The cardinal, leader of the Boston Archdiocese, "squarely told us he was concerned about who we are and who we aspire to be," said Jim Post, Voice's president.

Four leaders from the group, formed this year by Catholics upset with the church's failure to rid the clergy of sexually abusive priests, met privately with the cardinal at the chancery for more than two hours.

Law twice told the Voice representatives that he wished they had consulted with him before forming their organization, said Bill Cadigan, vice president of the group.

"We saw that there are areas that we agree on and others that we don't," Cadigan said. "We didn't solve all of our problems in this meeting."

Voice in the Faithful started in a suburban parish early this year as the clerical sex abuse crisis which has plagued the church in 2002 unfolded in Boston. Voice now counts 25,000 members worldwide.

The group's critics say Voice of the Faithful is using the abuse crisis to change church teachings. But Voice leaders says they only want to help the church become stronger, partly through greater involvement of the laity.

Law and the group have had a contentious relationship, with the cardinal refusing to accept its donations and barring new chapters from meeting on church property. Those were among the topics of discussion Tuesday.

Donna Morrissey, a spokeswoman for the archdiocese, said Law viewed the meeting as a chance for the group to define its aims and how it viewed its relationship to the church.

"While the emergence of new groups is a constant in the history of the church, a proper discernment must always take place to insure their compatibility with the faith, discipline and mission of the church," she said.

Morrissey would not detail what was said at the meeting, which she described as "cordial, respectful."

She said Law, who initially refused requests to meet with Voice leaders, was willing to see with the group again.

Voice of the Faithful's Compassion Fund has raised about $56,000, and has appealed to Catholics who feel disenfranchised by the sex scandals.
