Internet job boards seek hourly workers for listings

NEW YORK (AP) — Wanted: Truck drivers, plumbers, nurses, cashiers and the businesses who hire them.

After years of pitching themselves primarily to resume-toting professionals and their prospective employers, the big Internet job sites are trying to muscle into the recruitment market for blue-collar and service workers.

Monster.com will use an ad during this Sunday's Super Bowl to tout changes in its listings and application process geared to workers paid by the hour. The new campaign follows the December launch by CareerBuilder.com of its own online recruitment tool for so-called "skilled and hourly" workers.

HotJobs.com, owned by Yahoo!, says it also is working to broaden its efforts in the hourly market.

The new focus comes as the online job boards struggle to generate business in an economy notable for its lack of new jobs.

"Last quarter, Monster's revenue was down almost 30 percent, year over year," said Matthew Litfin, an analyst with William Blair & Co. "Who can blame a company for trying to stem a decline of that magnitude?"

Monster and its rivals say they're wooing hourly workers out of logic, not desperation. Workers paid by the hour are 60 percent of the nation's labor force, and more of them are frequenting the Internet.

"It's the size and the revenue potential of the market, regardless of how the economy is doing, that's drawing people there," said Matt Ferguson, CareerBuilder's chief operating officer.

For the Web sites, the hourly job market — which they define broadly to cover everyone from construction workers to nurses — is largely fresh territory since most of those jobs are filled through newspaper classified ads or staffing agencies.

The first Internet job boards to venture in were specialty sites like constructionjobs.com, and employmentguide.com, affiliated with a chain of free ad circulars focused on the blue-collar market.

Monster edged into the market early last year, when it started a test site in the Cincinnati area. It was matched by Cincinnati Enquirer newspaper, owned by Gannett Co., which started its own online recruitment board. That helped shape the expansion of CareerBuilder, owned jointly by the Gannett, Knight-Ridder and Tribune Co. newspaper chains.

Monster and CareerBuilder say there are important differences between the way hourly and salaried workers look for jobs.

Most hourly workers find jobs by filling out applications rather than creating and sending out resumes. So both sites allow jobseekers to file an application that can be viewed by employers.

The job boards acknowledge that some hourly workers don't have computer access, so they have set up phone-based services to accept applications.
