Finding a vessel such as the Western Empire in the Gulf of Mexico is not a rare occurrence, said Dr. Bill Bryant, A&M professor of oceanography. Thousands of ships of all sizes have gone down in the gulf during the years, he said.

Two years ago, employees of an oil company working on an undersea pipe came across the Mica, and from this chance encounter came a research project made possible by a $250,000 backing from Exxon Mobil.

A synergy between archeology and oceanography must be achieved to uncover all the mysteries behind ships such as the Mica and the Western Empire, Phanuef said. It is a process of knowing when the ship sank, and how the wreck occurred and inferring what was going on in the ocean at that time.

Oil companies have compiled a list of nearly 300 ships that have gone down in the Gulf of Mexico, and these are just two of those, leaving many more discoveries for oceanographers as well as nautical archeologists, who have also taken interest in the study of these ships' remains.

"The Gulf of Mexico holds the largest collection of deep-sea ships that have not yet been discovered, and we hope to head back down there as soon as the funds allow," Phaneuf said.
