DIGITAL VINYL CD-R™ FROM VERBATIM: IT LOOKS LIKE A RECORD.

A long time ago, before your parents were old, music came on vinyl discs called "records". They looked cool. But that's about it. So we decided to bring back the funky, old school look of a record and endow it with our highest quality CD-R technology. The result is a disc that both burns better and looks cooler than other CD-Rs. Nice.

more time to do their work. "A little bit more time? Saddam Hussein has had 12 years to disarm," he said.

Dramatically raising his right hand, the president said that he had sworn to defend the Constitution and protect America's security. "That's exactly what I am going to do," he said.

Bush promised not to lead the war into another Vietnam-like quagmire.

"Our mission is clear in Iraq," the president. "Should we have to go in, our mission is very clear: disarmament. In order to disarm, it will mean regime change. I'm confident that we'll be able to achieve that objective in a way that minimizes the loss of life."

The president's news conference came on the eve of a crucial Security Council meeting. On Friday, chief weapons inspector Hans Blix and his counterpart, Mohamed ElBaradei, will report on Iraq's measure of cooperation in eliminating its banned weapons. Their assessment could weigh heavily in determining the outcome of the Security Council's vote on a resolution to authorize force.

With 230,000 U.S. troops poised outside Iraq, the president said only Saddam can ensure peace. "It's his choice to make whether or not we go to war. He's the person that can make the choice of war or peace. Thus far he's made the wrong choice."

Before the news conference, Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin talked about the U.N. resolution, White House aides said. They agreed to continue discussions.

Intensifying his case against Saddam, Bush is considering a major address next week to explain the justification and risks of military conflict, aides said. The speech could include a final warning to Saddam while urging journalists and humanitarian workers to leave Iraq, they said.

But officials said the president is not inclined to set an eleventh-hour deadline for Iraq's disarmament, fearing Saddam would use the grace period to further divide U.S. allies. They did not rule out the United States backing a British proposal that would give the Iraqi leader a few more days to disarm. But aides acknowledged that the British proposal was unlikely to be a galvanizing force.

Bush has privately expressed frustration with Saddam's ability to turn France and other allies against the resolution just 12 months after a similar measure passed 15-0 in the Security Council, aides said.

Though he said there was some hope for peace, Bush repeatedly spoke in the past tense about Saddam's ability to avoid war — leaving the impression that war was imminent.

"I don't like war," he said, wishing that Saddam Hussein had listened to the demands of the world and disarmed. That was my hope."

At turns somber and light, Bush joked a few times with reporters. He grew teary-eyed while saying it was a "humbling experience" to know that people he's never met "have lifted up and my family up in prayer. It's been a comforting feeling, I know that."

Asked how his faith was guiding him through the deliberations, Bush said he prays daily, "I pray for guidance and wisdom and strength." He added that if he decides to send troops into war, "I would pray for their safety and I would pray for the safety of innocent Iraqi lives as well."

Northern actions in the past two weeks include:

— The dispatch of a MiG-19 warplane across the South's western sea border. The plane quickly retreated after South Korean jets flew to the area.

— The test-firing of an anti-ship missile on the eve of the inauguration of South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

— The reactivation of a 5-megawatt nuclear reactor that is part of a suspected weapons program.

— The interception by MiG-29 warplanes of a U.S. reconnaissance plane in international airspace off North Korea's east coast.

North Korea's next step might be to switch on the reprocessing plant at the Yongbyon nuclear complex north of Pyongyang, a possible prelude to the manufacture of several nuclear weapons by the summer. That would involve the transfer of 8,000 spent fuel rods in stainless steel canisters from a cooling pond to the plant.

All the North Korean actions appear to have been carefully planned, but the possibility of an isolated confrontation seems higher than it has been in years.

"What worries me the most is the possibility of miscalculation and accidental outbreak of hostilities on the account of escalating nuclear tensions," Alexandre Mansourov, a Northeast Asia security expert, said in a commentary released by the Nautilus Institute, a Berkeley, California-based research group.

Sigal, the analyst in New York, said this week of an annual U.S.-South Korean military exercise called "Foil Eagle" has heightened tension with North Korea. Communist forces are also engaging in winter training.

"We're at a point in which the propaganda of the North is pretty high-pitched, which means our armed forces are hyper-vigilant, hyper-attentive," Sigal said.
