Terror alert drops to yellow

By John J. Lumpkin
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration lowered the terror alert level from orange to yellow Wednesday, saying the end of heavy fighting in Iraq has diminished the threat of terrorism in the United States.

It was unclear whether the heightened alert had prevented any terrorist attacks, officials said. A number of security measures around the country will be relaxed, officials at the Department of Homeland Security said.

For example, the federal "Operation Liberty Shield" — the code name for security measures keyed specifically to the war on Iraq — will be terminated. It called for National Guard or state police to be posted at nuclear power plants and other critical facilities.

Still, a significant threat remains, officials said.

The new, yellow level marks an elevated risk of terrorist attacks. It is the middle level on the five-tier danger scale. The old level, orange, signifies a high risk and is the second-highest level. A red alert has not been declared since the system was begun 13 months ago.

"We must be vigilant and alert to the possibility that al-Qaida and those sympathetic to their cause, as well as former Iraqi-regime state agents and affiliated organizations, may attempt to conduct attacks against the U.S. or our interests abroad," Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge said.

The threat level was raised on March 17, two days before the war began.
