Library

in Boston is the most popular presidential library because of the location, but the Bush Library had 3,000 more visitors last year than the Lyndon Baines Johnson Library located on the University of Texas campus, Blake said.

"From where we are located the numbers are very good. We will try for the next million in the next three years," he said.

But before the one millionth visitor was greeted, visitors to the library Monday afternoon caught a glimpse of the first portrait of father and son presidents.

The painting features the former president and his son President George W. Bush standing side by side, looking into the distance.

The portrait was commissioned in 2001 by the George Bush Library Foundation and painted by New York artist Ronald N. Sherr, Blake said.

The portrait was inspired by the Bush Library exhibit "Fathers and Sons: Two families Four Presidents." The only other father-son presidents, John Quincy Adams and his son John Adams, were never painted together.

"It is a unique opportunity to show both presidents together and their family connection," said Patricia Burchfield, museum curator. "It is a very good and handsome portrait to have in our collection."

Sherr made a trip in 2001 to Camp David, and was told that he only had 30 minutes to take photographs for the painting.

Former President Bush joked that he and his son acquired the nicknames 41 and 43 because of Sheer.

"He was a little nervous," Bush said. "He looked at his own watch and he'd burned up about four minutes and he said 'all right 41 would you look out there and 43, look out there.'"

Blake said the Smithsonian museum in Washington D.C. has already requested the portrait be on display there.

However, Blake said, the painting will stay in College Station at least through the summer.

"We hope folks want to see it," he said. "It is definitely a kudos for the community, plus students should remember they get in free, so they have no excuses."

Tuition

tuition.

Justin Unruh, spokesman for Morrison, said the bill, which the committee took up two weeks ago, is still a work in progress as Morrison tries to build a consensus among committee members about the issue.

"We're not wedded to any specific plan," Unruh said. "Our main concerns are to give universities the (tuition) flexibility they need to remain competitive and to provide protection for middle income families. We don't want them to bear the brunt (of tuition hikes)."

If the House passes a deregulation measure, a conference committee will hammer out a compromise between the Senate and House tuition bills, Unruh said.

With tuition deregulation dead in the Senate, A&M officials are studying Morrison's bill and other deregulation proposals, but have not decided whether to support any specific legislation, said Bob Wright, A&M University System spokesman.

Until there is a better idea of just how deep the budget cuts will go, the University cannot estimate how much leeway it will need to raise tuition to offset losses in funding.

"We've heard so many different (budget) numbers," Wright said. "Sooner or later one figure will rise to the top and we can start making more accurate calculations."

Bozeman, a civil affairs officer attached to the 82nd Airborne Division, said U.S. special forces treated scores of pilgrims for sprains, cramps and heat exhaustion.

In addition, the U.S. military said police on Monday arrested six men who had been planning to blow up two of Karbala's mosques. Five of the detainees claimed to be members of Saddam's Baath Party, and one said he belonged to al-Qaida.

Hastert to discuss public affairs at A&M
