looking for education majors and only 193 student teachers," Turner said. "That's almost a different school for every student." Jeffrey Scott Jones, an agricultural economics major graduating in May, said finding a job was not difficult for him.

"I began my search in the fall of last semester," Jones said. "I haven't had any problems finding jobs, but I've been really aggressive about it." Jones has not yet accepted any of the three jobs he has been offered.

Becky Carr, assistant dean of the Department of Education, said jobs for new teachers have continued to be readily available.

"About 85 percent of our graduates go into the classroom and teach," Carr said. "Our assumption is that that other 15 percent is not looking for a job either because they get married or go on to graduate school."

Public education could face a $1.4 billion budget cut in the face of a bill passed last week in the Texas House of Representatives. A budget cut could reduce the number of teachers hired in public schools, according to The Daily Texan.

Carr said teaching jobs are usually not filled until after graduation.

"Generally about 20-30 percent have a job prior to graduation, but most of the jobs are not filled until June," Carr said.

Turner said contacting Aggies Helping Aggies, which has more than 500 alumni, and doing lots of research would aid students in their job search.

Turner said using the Career Center's free services could also help students locate jobs faster.

"Students can register now with the Career Center without the usual $35 per semester fee and continue to look for jobs all summer," she said. "I really encourage students to stay in touch with us."

Jones said being open to different kinds of jobs is important in the job search process.

"The best advice I can give is to not limit yourself to Texas or to particular careers or industries," she said.

leading member Mohsen Hakim told AP in Tehran.

Bodine told reporters, "I think we are going to see more of an indigenous representation, simply because we've had more time to organize."

"There's going to be a lot of leadership emerging," she said. No obvious presidential choice has appeared thus far, however, and Bodine would not be drawn out on names. "I wouldn't know today who that's going to be."

In the Spanish capital, Madrid, a gathering of Iraqi exiles issued a statement calling for Iraq to be governed by a federal system that respects all religions, ethnic groups and women's rights. Their three-day meeting was sponsored by Spain's government, which was a staunch supporter of the U.S.-led attack on Saddam's regime.

The conference in Ur agreed on a set of 13 principles, among them that Iraq must be democratic, Saddam's Baath Party must be dissolved and a future government should be organized as a federal system — the last point an acknowledgment of the difficulty of centrally governing a land and society divided between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, Kurds and Arabs.

The series of conferences is to produce an "interim authority" led by a new president that would pave the way for a constitution and democratic elections two years or more in the future.

Shiites, a 60 percent majority long suppressed under Saddam's Sunni-dominated regime, have been enthusiastically exercising newfound freedoms, organizing community-level political activities, protests against the U.S. occupation and religious events.

Open elections in Iraq might produce a government dominated by the Shiite clergy, as in neighboring Iran, some observers believe. But Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld insisted in an Associated Press interview last week, "That isn't going to happen."

"We cannot have a regime like that in Iraq where a few religious men control the situation in Iraq," Rumsfeld said. "The men and women of Iran want freedom and change. A regime like that of Iran is not compatible with our vision for Iraq."

In other developments Sunday: —Central Command announced that Lt. Gen. Hossain Mohammed Amin, the Saddam government's chief liaison to U.N. weapons inspectors, was in U.S. custody, latest in a series of ex-officials who have surrendered or been captured.

Cadets will be closely monitored by members of the commandant's office for signs of accelerated weight loss indicative of eating disorders, Groves said.

The weight loss program is more conducive to eating disorders than the athletic program or other interventions, said Dr. Mary Cove, psychologist with the Student Counseling Center. The cadet in the weight loss program will not be monitored by medical professionals.

Cadet leaders support the new weight rules, saying the Corps' rigorous exercise program requires a certain level of fitness.

"Aside from personal appearance it's a matter of health. It's an issue of safety," said Matt Malone, the P-2 commander.

Survey

Sherry Wine, associate director of Special Event Facilities, said the survey could help the department in making decisions about alcohol issues.

"Special Event Facilities constantly wrestles with the issue of serving alcohol at the Arena for concerts, basketball games and other events because there is an argument that serving alcohol would increase the number and types of events and attendance and bring in more revenue," Wine said.

The survey also found that 71 percent of students felt their involvement made an above average or very strong contribution to their overall college experience.

Kelly Howard, a member of Change, a new student organization that collects funds to help purchase Aggie Rings, said being involved in campus organizations has been a positive experience and gives students a more diverse group of friends from different areas.

"Being in Change has shown me how much Aggies care for one another," said Howard, a sophomore agricultural development major.

This phone survey was conducted as part of the Aggie Ring program, which is modeled after a project at Pennsylvania State University. Roberts said Student Studies plans to conduct six to eight surveys on varying topics per academic year.

Complete survey results will be viewed on the Student Studies Web site at <http://stls.tamu.edu>.
