San Antonio plans NBA title fiesta

By T.A. Badger
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN ANTONIO — Let the good times keep rolling. Make that "floating."

San Antonio, a city that takes its festivities seriously, has set aside Wednesday for a citywide celebration of the Spurs' second NBA championship.

The revelry will start with a barge parade along the Riverwalk in downtown San Antonio, and then adjourn for another event in the biggest room in town — the Alamodome, where the team played for nine years before moving into the new SBC Center this season.

"San Antonio throws great parties, and this will be another party to be remembered," pledged Mayor Ed Garza in a written statement.

Much of the city was nursing a collective hangover Monday after whooping it up into the wee hours after the Spurs captured the championship by beating the New Jersey Nets, 88-77, on Sunday night.

Thousands of joyous Spurs fans jammed downtown San Antonio after the final buzzer to take part in the victory. Motorists inched bumper to bumper along the main thoroughfares, often with their passengers hanging out windows to thrust their fists into the humid night air or slap hands with sidewalk-bound onlookers.

Capitalists

Before the war, the brothers were helping a Jordan-based trading operation bring oil field equipment and other industrial goods into Iraq under the United Nations "oil-for-food" program, which is being shut down. So they figure it's time to look for other opportunities.

Prices are falling, particularly for those carrying wads of Iraq dinars, which have started gaining in value against the U.S. dollar.

Outside the Al Yaser Showroom, proprietor Ayad Hussein is offering Toshiba television sets for 280,000 dinars (about $200), down from 350,000 dinars before the war. But his biggest seller is the Kenko toaster oven, which has plunged from about 80,000 dinars to 36,000 dinars, or $26, today.

The price has fallen so far, Hussein decided to buy one himself to give to his wife's family.

Less than a block away, 21-year-old Ali Shamel and a friend sell only one product from their sidewalk storefront: soda pop, by the case, hauled in daily on flatbed trucks.

"The Main Center for Pepsi," says their hand-painted banner. "We have different sizes. Reasonable prices."

The current favorite is Pepsi-Cola bottled in Saudi Arabia, about $7 for a case of 24. Egyptian Pepsi occupies second place, followed by Coca-Cola, 7-Up and regional brands Chipper and Oranta. Shamel said he sells about 100 per day and clears about $25 after expenses.

Some Iraqis see reconstruction as an opportunity to start something from scratch. Others see it as an opportunity to expand what they already have.

Salah Talab has been operating his House of Elegant Bodies weightlifting gym in a nondescript concrete building for seven years. But the sign is in Arabic, and he wasn't getting new business despite all the newcomers flocking to Baghdad.

Earlier this month, he put up a framed poster of a well-oiled and fully flexed Schwarzenegger above the doorway.

The marketing guy paid off. "Foreigners came and worked out," he said.

Talab, a former Mr. Asia titleholder who was jailed briefly by Saddam's regime for importing American nutritional supplements, hopes to attract more international patrons with special postwar promotional rates.
