Palestinian police take control of Bethlehem

By Lara Sukhtian
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BETHLEHEM, West Bank — Sirens blaring, Palestinian police moved Wednesday into the West Bank town of Bethlehem, the second area handed over by Israel under a U.S.-backed Mideast peace plan.

The handover of the ancient town considered the birthplace of Jesus comes after an upbeat summit between the Israeli and Palestinian premiers boosted hope for an end to 33 months of bloodshed.

Residents clapped and cheered as a column of about 60 police in dark blue uniforms marched from their barracks toward the center of town, followed by a single motorbike and two cars.

Police had to walk because there were not enough vehicles to transport all of them, they said.

"Welcome, welcome," a grandmother, Hilal Murra, told them. "It's better to see them in the streets than the Israelis."

Paving the way for the handover, Israeli troops withdrew from part of northern Gaza Strip on Sunday, in line with the "road map" peace plan announced by President Bush at a June 4 Mideast summit.

The handover came a day after Israeli and Palestinian leaders on Tuesday promised painful concessions, furthering hopes of ending three years of bloodshed. The three main Palestinian militant groups — Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction — have declared a temporary halt in attacks on Israelis.

Israeli army trucks started carrying away armored vehicles and containers full of equipment from two Israeli bases Tuesday, withdrawing to the outskirts of Bethlehem. They officially turned over security to Palestinians shortly after midday, a military statement said.
