Enrollment

"It's going to be more expensive to go to school here next year," he said. "So that might be another reason why students are saying, 'I may need to work a little bit more and get a little more money this summer.'"

Maryann Ruddock, associate director of institutional research at the University of Texas, said UT's first summer session enrollment increased over last year's. Second summer session figures for UT will not be available until mid-August, she said.

This year 16,325 students were enrolled in UT first summer session, nine- and 12-week courses.

During 2002, UT had 16,123 students enrolled for first summer session, nine- and 12-week courses, Ruddock said.

consist of math, science, social studies and humanities, Slater said. The students will work on their projects all week and then present them to the school during a Friday presentation.

The presentations must take some sort of multimedia form such as a PowerPoint presentation, a Web page, digital media or a combination of these.

Students can choose to work alone or in teams, with each member of the team sharing the same grade, Slater said. After the assembly, the grading sessions will begin.

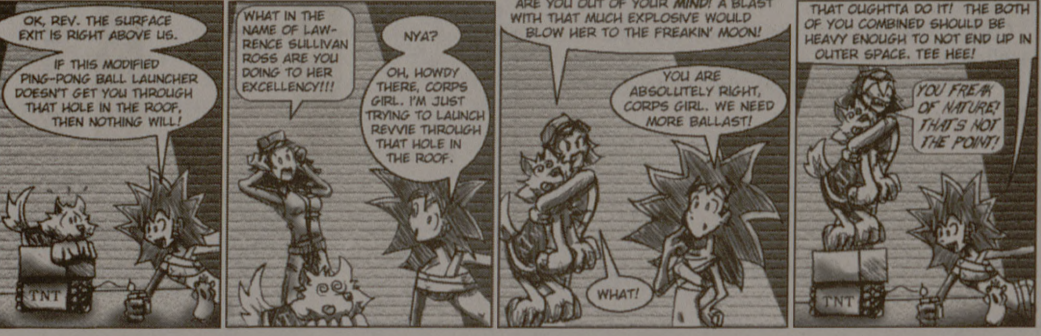

"In the grading sessions, students again present their work one by one or in teams, but this is a private session with two teachers who discuss the work with them and involve them in the grading," he said.

The curriculum follows the Texas Education Agency's guidelines, and diplomas from AISIC will be recognized just like any other private school diploma. The school will follow the same schedule as A&M, but because everything is done online, students will be able to submit work during breaks and summers as well, Slater said.

Another opportunity students will have is the exchange program. According to the school's Web site, there is a branch of the school in Hyderabad, India, with others under development in Europe, Mexico and South America. Students will be allowed to transfer between campuses for a semester or a year.

"AISIC will be a high-quality, high-tech, college-preparatory inquiry-creativity school, a middle-high school with the atmosphere of a little or mini-college or university," Slater said.

a second lieutenant upon his graduation, Jessica said.

When he was a junior he met Jessica, a freshman at the time. They married on Dec. 18, 2001 and she gave birth to a son, Justin, on Oct. 24, 2002.

For his service in Iraq,

Rozier was awarded a purple heart and two bronze stars, one for valor.

During a battle at Al Hillah, the infantrymen riding on the tanks in Rozier's platoon became pinned down by enemy fire. Rozier positioned his tanks between those soldiers and the oncoming enemy forces and wiped out the attackers, Jessica said.

"At his service in Ft. Riley, troops who knew him came up to me crying, telling me stories like that," she said. "One soldier, for example, said that he was about to open a door to a building they were clearing out when, through a window, Jonathan saw a bomb and dived to push the man out of the way in time. That just says what kind of man Jon was."

his support of rebels there in a brutal civil war.

The United States demands the departure of Taylor, blamed in 14 years of conflict in Liberia that have killed more than 100,000 since 1989, and accused of weapons trafficking and arming insurgents across much of the region.

Taylor made, and broke, repeated cease-fires, peace accords and power-sharing deals in the 1990s, often launching attacks on past deployments of West African forces here.

His government said Saturday that Taylor would leave Liberia only when an adequate number of peacekeepers are on the ground, and when the war-crimes indictment is dropped.

U.N. prosecutors are adamant that Taylor face justice, raising the prospect of a standoff with the international peacekeepers and foreign powers.

On Sunday, a small West African assessment team laying the groundwork for the peacekeepers was gathering generators, food and fuel. Some of the goods were provided by U.S. suppliers through an already-announced $10 million U.S. support contract for the mission, said Col. Theophilus Tawiah of Ghana, the force's chief of staff.

Debt-strapped Nigeria says it need far more international backing for the mission, expected to eventually cost at least $2 million daily.

The military team also was surveying the main airport for camp sites, Tawiah said.

Desperately needed food for Monrovia's people began trickling in. A half-ton of high-energy biscuits, part of an eventual 12-ton shipment, arrived in Monrovia on Saturday, the World Food Program said.

The French group Medecins sans Frontieres also flew in bags of rice on Saturday. Save the Children said it planned to bring in 30 tons of supplies, including cholera medicine and rehydration kits and baby clothes later Sunday.

Fighting since early June has killed well over 1,000 civilians in the capital. Combat has cut off the port and the main water plant, leaving the city of more than 1 million — now crowded with hundreds of thousands of refugees — desperately short of food and water, and wracked by cholera.

A West African military official said the force expected rebels to withdraw from Monrovia's port soon after the peacekeepers arrive, allowing more supplies into the nearly cutoff capital.

Iraq

In fact, al-Jaafari is Iraq's first president since Saddam for a very simple reason: Of the nine leaders in the rotating presidency, his name comes first in the Arabic alphabet.

On the streets, al-Jaafari's appointment hasn't caused much of a stir. In an entirely unscientific survey of 10 Baghdadis asked Sunday to name their president, only one came up with al-Jaafari's name.

Most people said they didn't know who he was. One named L. Paul Bremer, the American administrator of Iraq. One named President Bush.

Many Iraqis don't trust al-Jaafari and other former exiles on the council, saying they spent so long abroad that they have lost their connection with Iraqis who suffered under Saddam.

"I don't know anything about his background, but he came in on the American tanks," said driver Wa'ed Hussein, 51. Of the council members, he said: "They're supposed to represent the Iraqi people, but they have no roots."

Al-Jaafari insists Iraqis support him.

"I have no statistics, but people love me. They see that I am not very happy about being president, because I love to live a normal life," he said in an interview this weekend in the council's new offices.

The offices, one of the few places in Iraq where men wear suit jackets, boast manicured lawns and marble floors. The luxurious building once was a resthouse for Lt. Gen. Hussein Kamel, a cousin and son-in-law of Saddam who defected to Jordan, then was lured back to Iraq and killed in 1996.

It was heavily looted after the Americans entered Baghdad, and has been restored by coalition political consultants. Brand-new computers sit on brand-new desks amid freshly painted rooms and newly installed air conditioners.

American armored vehicles guard the compound, and visitors are shuttled to the offices in a military zone aboard a Toyota Land Cruiser with 3,537 miles on the odometer, its seats still wrapped in factory plastic.

Inside, workers — Iraqi bureaucrats and American "facilities consultants" — chat away on cell phones, which are still illegal for the Iraqi public.

Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a shy doctor who moved back to Iraq from London, is Iraq's new president until the end of the month. Iraq's Governing Council has chosen nine leaders to rotate into the position through April.

Profile

Office — Former resthouse of Saddam's son-in-law transformed by the U.S. forces into government headquarters

al-Jaafari

Position — Presides over Iraq's Governing Council; the U.S. military has veto power over its political decisions

Priorities — The council is now meeting daily and has been discussing ways to establish a constitution and appoint a Cabinet

Government — Says he envisions a government that blends Islamic political traditions and Western-style democracy

Personal — Is married and has five children who remain in London. He is currently staying at a friends house those of U.S. administrators and military officers, can be reached only by dialing the United States. It has a 914 area code — Westchester County, an area of wealthy New York suburbs where Bill and Hillary Clinton have a house.

Al-Jaafari said he has a good relationship with the Americans. Bremer has been to his house for lunch. Al-Jaafari said the American promised not to use his veto power unless there is a "crisis situation."

"There is a development in his understanding of Iraq," al-Jaafari said of Bremer. "I think he wants success for the Governing Council."

But the Iraqi president made clear the Americans are expected to leave soon — "in one year, more or less."

"The Americans fulfilled their promise to topple Saddam Hussein," he said. "They also have to fulfill their promise to leave."

Al-Jaafari's relationship with the Americans goes only so far. He boycotted a U.S.-organized meeting of Iraqi politicians near the biblical city of Ur in April, saying at the time: "We have our reservations against attending a meeting called for by a military side."
