to persuade minorities to come here and change the perception that minorities are not welcome at A&M.

"It is simply unacceptable for Texas A&M's student body to be 85 percent white," Gates said.

Gates also discussed the importance of building space in the University's goal of improvement.

He cited Wehner's new Convincing and the new Chemical Engineering building, but said A&M must develop a way to expand, especially with the increase of faculty members.

Gates explained his new initiative of the creation of the Honor Council and Honor System to enforce the Aggie Code of Honor.

Stephanie James, senior mechanical engineering major, said she agreed with Gates' address and thinks the Honor System is necessary.

"Dr. Gates is definitely taking us in the right direction," James said. "I commend Dr. Gates for the return of the Aggie Code of Honor."

The convocation recognized recently hired tenure and tenured-track professors along with professors who had been promoted in the past year.

University of Michigan President Emeritus James J. Duderstadt, who keynoted A&M's "Vision 2020" kickoff program three days ago, spoke on current trends of higher education.

During closing, Gates referred to himself as an "agent for change" and is ready for the process ahead.

"What is the state of the University?" Gates said. "It is in a state of dramatic change. Changes will transform A&M for the next several years."

Clarification

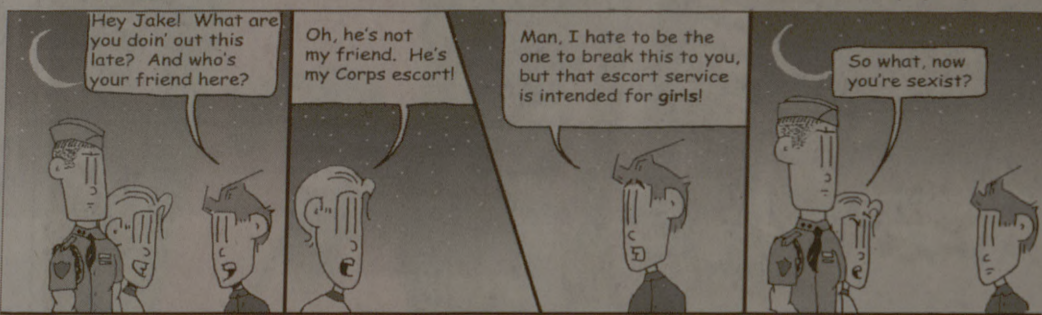

In Wednesday's page 1 article, "Johnson delays journalism decision," Texas A&M may no longer offer incoming freshmen the option of majoring in journalism. Dean of Liberal Arts Charles Johnson is still considering reports from faculty committees before he makes a recommendation for the Department of Journalism's future to the provost and executive vice president's office.

with one another within the past 100 years, making what is happening now a miracle.

He was also asked about his feelings toward former U.S. President Ronald Reagan, who also played a role in the conclusion of the Cold War.

"(Reagan) was frequently underestimated and misinterpreted," Kohl said.

In regard to Germany's willingness to become a part of the UN Security Council, Kohl said that while he was not representative of the opinions of the government or people of Germany, attempting to join would bring trouble.

"The Federal Republic of Germany won't disappear because it's not a part of the council," Kohl said.

Kohl emphasized the importance of the German-American relationship, saying both countries have a common history and a common advantage.

"I cannot see any reason," Kohl said, "why there should be division between Germans and Americans."
