an event when he visited Detroit, where he was referred to as the "former dictator of Canada" by airport personnel. He spoke of Canada's relationship with America, specifically with the Canadian-U.S. Free Trade Agreement that has spawned the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States.

"Trade between Canada and the United States generates $70 billion," Mulroney said.

In regards to the addition of Mexico to the Free Trade Agreement, Mulroney emphasized the improvement in Mexico's economy.

"Mexico's economy is one-twelfth of Japan's," Mulroney said. "Yet, it beat out Japan for being the second highest trade partner with the U.S."

Mulroney also said he was concerned with the state of international security. He spoke of Sept. 11, 2001, saying it was a day that affected the entire civilized world.

"The appalling atrocities of September 11 must be seen as a declaration of war, not just in America but on all civilized people," Mulroney said.

The goal of the government should be to ensure that something like this never happens again, Mulroney said.

"The president of the United States must take whatever action is required to protect America from attack so it will not be seen as a critical time in history," he said.

He also urged the importance of keeping good relations with other countries.

"America greatly needs international allies, now more than ever," Mulroney said.

He advised the United States to become involved with allies that would inform the country when its actions were strongly opposed elsewhere. He also emphasized the importance of supporting current President Bush's plan to maintain and improve the state of the nation.

"Democracies have limited stay power," Mulroney said. "America is becoming a lonely super power, frustrated and reluctant. We should not give up on Bush's roadmap to peace."

The announcement of the consolidation of Canada's two conservative parties would push Canada toward more conservatism, Mulroney said. He was the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

"I don't know whether they'll win the next election and I don't care," Mulroney said. "But with this step they will win an election in the future."

University directives and to ensure orderliness in hall and room appearance, Mills said.

"This act does not infringe on the students' rights," he said. "Membership in the Corps of Cadets is voluntary."

In joining the Corps, cadets voluntarily agree not only to abide by the requirements of the University's rules for students, but policies and procedures for the operation of the Corps contained in The Standard, Mills said.

While there is no drug testing of cadets, he said, inspections of student living quarters have been performed since 1876.

"Although we cannot say conclusively that detection dogs have never been used in the Corps dorms, this is certainly the first time in recent memory that they have been used," Mills said.

The senior cadet member said Col. Shady Groves, assistant commandant, asked him and his roommate to step outside of their room so the search could be conducted.

"Four dogs sniffed for about two minutes and then they left," he said.

In this particular inspection, the detection dogs were used to ensure compliance with the Corps' zero tolerance policy regarding drugs and alcohol, as well as University policies against possession of explosives such as fireworks, firearms, ammunition and similar items, Mills said.

Inspections are run periodically throughout the school year. This time, inspections took place in Dorm 6 and part of Dorm 8, the cadet said.

"Inspections conducted to ensure compliance are a traditional feature of military life and are a fixture of all militaries everywhere," Mills said.

Students who are found to be in violation of Corps or University rules are subject to Corps or University disciplinary sanctions, or both.

The results of the search brought up no serious findings, Mills said. Texas A&M funds the service upon receipt of a properly completed invoice from the service provider, the Financial Management Services Office. The University issues a check for payment using funds from a departmental account designated by the Commandant's Office.

Mills said the service was paid for using discretionary funds from a non-state University account funded by external contributions. In this case, revenue from a Corps endowment managed by the Texas A&M Foundation was used. There was no student fee money used to fund this program, Mills said.

"This act does not infringe on the students' rights. Membership in the Corps of Cadets is voluntary."
