the Iranian pledges "a very positive development." But he also repeated the accusation that Iran is seeking the ability to make nuclear arms.

Among the many fears of the United States and its allies are Iranian nuclear warheads in range of Israel and a possible nuclear arms race in the Middle East.

Iran insists it seeks only energy and peaceful research from its nuclear program, including a Russian-built reactor expected to begin operation in 2005.

But Iran had been resisting the key demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency: an accord for unfettered nuclear inspections and a halt on enriching uranium, which is needed for reactors but can be highly enriched to weapons grade.

The reversal was linked to a European offer of greater cooperation on nuclear energy and non-military technology.

Iran still must convince the International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA, that it has no weapons program. Failure could shift debate to the Security Council, which could impose sanctions.

Iranian officials, however, appeared to move fast after Tuesday's breakthrough announcement.

The secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, Hasan Rowhani, said Iran would sign the protocol on expanded inspections before the next IAEA board meeting Nov. 20.

Ali Akbar Salehi, Iran's envoy to the IAEA, told state-run television that all remaining questions by the agency will be answered by Wednesday.

The IAEA list includes the origin of weapons-grade uranium traces discovered at two facilities. Iran claims the equipment was exposed before it entered the country, but has not publicly identified the source.

The EU "showed the U.S. that global issues can't be resolved by war and destruction, but by dialogue. It's a victory for us, the EU and the international community," Salehi said.

HAVE YOU RECEIVED DEFERRED ADJUDICATION?
SEAL YOUR CRIMINAL RECORD FROM PUBLIC DISCLOSURE

As of September 1, 2003, individuals who have completed deferred adjudication probation can petition for an order prohibiting the public disclosure of the details of the deferred adjudication probation.

Neither prospective employers, landlords nor anyone performing a criminal background search will have access to the details of your deferred adjudication probation. You may legally deny the arrest and prosecution, unless it is being used in a subsequent proceeding.

The new law applies to misdemeanor and felony charges. Depending on the nature of the charge, you may be eligible to file immediately upon completion of the deferred adjudication. Some misdemeanors will qualify after 5 years while some felonies will qualify 10 years after completion of deferred adjudication probation. Some offenses will not qualify.

Voting for Tuesday's House resolution were 84 Republicans, 192 Democrats and one independent. Two Democrats and 137 Republicans voted no.

Democrats called the vote a rebuke of President Bush's Iraq policies, especially his insistence that U.S. aid for reconstructing Iraq must be grants, not loans. Republicans said the roll call simply showed how nervous some lawmakers were about opposing better health care coverage for reservists and veterans.

"I didn't want anybody to be put on a spot, even on a symbolic vote on these issues," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bill Young, R-Fla., a sponsor of the Iraq funding bill. "I made it very clear members should vote as they felt."

Democrats took a different view.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the vote "a full-blown rebuff to the administration."

Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, top Democrat on the House Appropriations panel, said the vote was fueled by lawmakers' lingering resentment of Bush's tone in a meeting last week with senators, when he said he would not negotiate over Iraqi loans.

Obey said Bush "needs to learn to work well with others."

House and Senate negotiators are trying to produce a compromise $87 billion package for Iraq and Afghanistan by next week, and GOP leaders in both chambers say they intend to drop Senate-passed language making half the rebuilding aid a loan.
