Expanding horizons

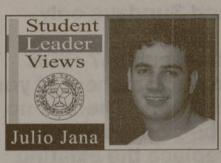

Students should consider study abroad programs or overseas internships n 1992

r ince the advent of higher education, students have been encouraged to think outside their comfort zone, shaping their own ideas while still respecting diverse views.

Texas A&M prides itself on the development of well-rounded students through the enriched "other education" it offers. This other education refers to knowledge attained through activities outside the classroom.

Since my beginning days at A&M, pro-excellence outside the classroom. From student organizations to experiencing leadership roles as well as internships, I have found that A&M offers various avenues and opportunities to attain this sort of knowledge. When pursuing this other education, one of

is to transcend national boundaries. When interviewing for a job, the importance of having world knowledge is evident. We live in a globalized society, therefore both multi-national companies and small businesses alike are concerned with global issues and affected by international affairs.

the most rewarding and beneficial experiences

As Aggies, we are fortunate not only because of our school traditions, but also because of the international environment

fessors and tutors have challenged me to strive for intellectual A&M provides. On this campus, every student has the opportunity to learn about the customs of numerous countries and cultures. This internationalization not only molds an individual's character but also provides him an advantage in the competitive job market.

MAIL CALL

Overseas internships and study abroad programs are just examples of the many ways the other education can be atta at this University. Following the philosophy that travel tragedy to the narrow-minded, we should all at one point in "go away," as the study abroad departmental advertising ca paigns states, and "become international" once and for all int multi-cultural planet.

If finance becomes an issue in pursuing this internat experience, there are 3,700 international students at A&M ing to share their experiences and world views with the rest the student body free of charge.

Twelfth Man is disappointing

I have been at Texas A&M for five years now and I have never been more disappointed with the Twelfth Man. It seems that the Twelfth man would rather sit back and be lazy than attempt to do their part at the football games. Many of you may have seen footage from the KU game that captured our students sitting down while our team is on the field; not only was this a disappointment but so was the fact that the third deck was about one-third empty.

I challenge the Twelfth man to yell louder than we ever have on Nov. 28. I want people to not have a voice when, they are leaving the game. For one game, lets not bicker about if we should uncover during our yells or complain why the two-percenters left, let's dig deep into tradition and do our part to help our team b.t.h.o. A&M a magical experience

I went to the Miami of Ohio v. Bowling Green football game in Oxford, Ohio. It was a Tuesday night game matchup of two top-20 ranked schools broadcast on ESPN. As the crowd approached the stadium I overheard students' comments. They were shocked at the amount of people attending the game, they were mesmerized by what it felt like to be in a sold-out stadium, they longingly wished out loud that "every game was like this," they were in awe of the crowd attendance of 28,000 fans. I was greatly saddened.

Since graduating from Texas A&M I haven't felt what I did every fall Saturday of my undergraduate career, and I didn't feel it last night. The crowd turned out because of ESPN's coverage of the game, not their love for their school. They left early, came late, and almost no one knew who the players on the field were. The band, well, was embarrassing and the crowd didn't really know when to be loud and when to shut up. I came away unbelievably thankful for the experience of going to A&M. Not just for the Saturdays spent at football games, but for the people who I was attending with. I am thankful that we could all be part of something bigger than ourselves whether that be at a game, Silver Taps, Muster or Fish Camp — it is something that others would love to have. Enjoy your days at A&M, it's a magical place.

More attention should be paid to soldiers dying in Iraq

In response to a Nov. 3 article:

I was a little disheartened when I saw the paper on Monday. I understand that Reveille is our school mascot. I was just in shock that burial of Reveille VI was the main head The po instead of the chopper crashing in Iraq. I a cause dis from Killeen/Fort Hood and have friends with though th are in the military. My father is currently ago aired an ernment contract worker. I was lucky that Connie C one I know was killed or injured this weekend Chung ca I also understand that the news of the cras atin that was seen on TV this Sunday, but many peop ment cau had no clue about what happened. have thei

These soldiers have been fighting for a awsuits freedom and protecting our lives from poss ble terrorist attacks. They are risking new seeing their family again.

Plus there are also fellow Aggies who are it Iraq fighting for us. So shouldn't their lives to drove the cherished as much as Reveille's? Should we be aware of what our fellow Aggies at going through?
