the undergraduate program and supervising the writing programs and more than 70 English department faculty.

As department head, Parrish plans to make more opportunities available to students and have an open door policy similar to Mitchell's. He also plans to keep the faculty well-informed.

"The key to continued success is to serve lots of undergraduates, graduates and faculty, and do it very well," Parrish said.

Dr. Claude Gibson, director of undergraduate studies for the English department, said Parrish has a good record of helping undergraduates.

"He's a man that has been an administrator at all levels and is a fine teacher," Gibson said. "He takes teaching very seriously and really models what his fellow faculty should do."

Parrish has also backed the arts at A&M, contributing to programs such as MSC OPAS and KAMU-TV, Gibson said.

"He will do great. His whole record speaks of that," Gibson said. "In deciding the new department head, his name went forward with lots of support.

We're excited about the future of the English department at Texas A&M."

Mitchell said Parrish will be a great asset because of his extensive contacts in the community, especially in the area of arts and humanities.

"I'm sure he will be a success," Mitchell said. "He is well respected throughout the University."

Parrish said he looks forward to working with the faculty during the next few years.

"One of the most enjoyable features will be to create opportunities for the faculty," Parrish said. "I hope to bring additional funding to the department."

said Shanks, who will be wearing security at the game.

Shanks said at the first session they filled out papers, watched videos and had prints taken.

U.S. Secret Service and Houston Police Department members were on hand for the second session. They taught volunteers how to search tators, pat people down and put them through the detectors.

"Training was fun," Tyler Langford, a sophomore agriculture life sciences major. "It was interesting to learn the Secret Service. They show us how small weapons are concealed and what to do in case scenarios."

Cadets selling program Facility Merchandising Inc. to undergo background checks but did not receive any training, said Chris Krueger, Corps operations officer and senior mechanical engineering major.

Payment from CSC is based on hours and manpower, and the payment from FMI is based on commission, said James Woods, senior communications major and public relations officer for the Corps. How money is spent will be decided at a later date by the chain command, starting with Corps Commander McAdams.

Krueger said since Super Bowl tickets are so expensive that most of the cadets attending will never get to experience something similar.

"We get in for free, although we are there to watch we still get to share in Krueger said.

Cadets involved said they are excited about the once-a-lifetime opportunity of participating in a Super Bowl.

"This is a great opportunity for us to represent Texas A&M as cadets at such a large event," Woods said.
