 Hamid said. "There's nothing special about them, and same thing with me. I'm just average guy. You don't have wine me and dine me at a five star restaurant."
 In an effort to keep his performances fun and unique, Hamid has involved a number of friends to help prepare and present his shows.
 "I have a lot of funny friends. I'm surrounded by funny people all the time," Hamid said.
 As a result, many have witnessed the construction of material first hand.
 "Through dialogue, stuff just pop up. I was telling a story about coming back from movie one time, and he came back with a reply that turned into a joke and worked way into the stand-up," said Jake Forker, a senior kinesiology major.
 Forker has known Hamid for several years and lends a hand by managing all helping out backstage during performances.
 Nick Mycock, a senior political science major, has actually performed with Hamid in the past and will be performing some opening stand-up comedy Friday evening.
 "Last fall was the first time performed with Kamran, and was definitely a funny, collaborative effort," Mycock said. "I'm looking forward to doing again."
 Hamid, Forker and Mycock all have high expectations for Friday's performance.
 "I guarantee it'll be the funniest show I've ever done," Hamid said.

NOISE & POLLUTION

And thus, our brave hero set out on his perilous quest to find Excalibur, the enchanted guitar.
 He journeyed for days without direction, with nothing firm to stand upon.
 Lost, clueless, unable to find a way out of this difficult situation.
 Armed with nothing but witty metaphors.
 MAN, I FEEL LIKE MICHAEL JACKSON'S DEFENSE TEAM!

 and wait for the right time.
 There were no independent eye witness reports of rebel movement, but there appeared to be very few fighter in Cap-Haitien, where hundreds had been seen Wednesday. Cap-Haitien is just 90 miles north of Port-au-Prince, but is a seven-hour drive over potholed roads sometimes reduced to bedrock.
 "Scouts were checking 'pockets of resistance,'" he said. That might include the government-held town of St. Marc, on the main road from Gonaives to Port-au-Prince.
 On Wednesday night, rebel commander Winter Etienne and others crowded around a map of Haiti on the wall of the Mont Joli Hotel, discussing the best route to take and whether to use boats to get around St. Marc.
 "It won't take a lot of days. We don't have all our lives to wait for what a dictator is going to do," Philippe said Thursday.
 A government official said Aristide's National Palace was defended by about 100 officers in Haiti's force of fewer than 4,000. Philippe has boasted he now commands 5,000 men.

Philippe said Wednesday he was going to give Aristide a chance to step down. On Saturday, Aristide agreed to a U.S.-backed plan to share power, but the opposition rejected it, saying he must step down.
 "We saw there was no hope for peace," Philippe said. "We spent a week waiting for this peace to come. We can't stay waiting for him to decide while his people are killing people. Every day, innocent people are being killed, houses are being burned."
 Concerned about the increasing chaos, France called for Aristide's resignation, saying "he bears grave responsibility for the current situation."
 "It's up to him to accept the consequences while respecting the rule of law," Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin said in a statement.
 French diplomatic officials confirmed Thursday that de Villepin was calling for Aristide to resign.
 Abel Descollines, a member of the opposition Democratic Platform coalition, praised France's statement and asked the United States and Canada to do the same.
 "We hope American and Canadian authorities will rally behind the French position to help Haiti avoid a civil war," he told French RTL radio.

 Jeff Stumpo, a graduate student in English and founder/host of Javashock, A&M's slam poetry club, said he feels that other graduate students in English are excited about Angelou's trip to A&M.
 "It's nice to have someone (on campus) who is a big name," Stumpo said.
 Stumpo describes Angelou's poetry as "strong" and "narrative," but also contextually significant.

controversy.
 "(Angelou) seems like a relatively safe writer to bring (to campus)," he said. "She has important and smart things to say, but she's not going to make the campus explode with controversy."
 Winn predicts a high turnout from the University and the Bryan-College Station area and expects the 2,500 capacity auditorium will be filled for the event.
 "MSC Diversity wanted to bring her (Angelou) in as a wrap up (for) Black History Month," Winn said. "Just to end with a bang."

 NEI. She thinks WIN is a great tool for women who are thinking about working in the nuclear engineering field because it gives them direct access.
 "The group is a network, and I think that it will be very helpful to students because they will have access to people who have worked in nuclear fields for many years," Bryant said.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Baylor to announce findings from basketball inquiry
 WACO, Texas (AP) — Baylor lawyers appointed by the school's administration have been reviewing evidence of reported NCAA rules violations under former coach Dave Bliss and the staff, including payments to star forward Patrick Denney Jr. and other basketball players.
 Findings from Baylor's internal investigation into the scandal were expected Thursday as university regents meet through the week's end to hear briefings on the private school's financial and academic health. Officials are reportedly concerned about declining enrollment, budget cuts and faculty dissatisfaction.
