Medicare actuary tells of pressure to keep estimate from Congress

WASHINGTON (AP) — Medicare actuary Richard Foster was between a rock and a hard place. If he told Congress the Medicare bill could cost more than $100 billion more than they thought, he could be fired. If he quit and went public, it would make a big splash but nothing likely would change for the next actuary. If he did nothing, Congress would pass a bill without having the best information, but he'd be around to fight another day.

Foster did nothing, and Congress last year passed what some people have called the most sweeping changes in history to Medicare, government's main health care program for the elderly and disabled Americans.

But Foster now is telling lawmakers that the Bush administration's top Medicare official last year withheld from Congress the legislation's actual estimated cost for political gain.

Since President Bush signed the bill in December, the administration has acknowledged it believes the Medicare law will cost $534 billion over 10 years — more than the $395 billion estimated by congressional budget analysts.

Keeping the bill's cost below $400 billion was considered crucial for winning enough votes from conservative Republicans so it would pass the House.
