

Riojas

freshman in high school, and she has since added the hammer throw to her repertoire.

"I have played every sport, and track and field is the hardest, most frustrating sport," Riojas said. "But it is also the most rewarding."

To practice her discus and hammer throws, Riojas completes throw after throw, meticulously working on her technique.

"Discus is a very technical event," Riojas said. "There are so many variables you must work on, and it takes lots of patience and perseverance."

After practice ends, Riojas heads over to the Bright Laboratory to ice down. She has struggled with tendonitis throughout her career and must undergo vigorous stretching and icing to prevent herself from getting sore. Twice a week, however, massage therapists visit the Bright Lab to help Jamie work out the stiffness in her throwing arm and upper body.

Riojas usually arrives home around 5:30 p.m., and has a couple of hours to relax and begin her studies before heading back to campus for meetings at 7:30 p.m.. On campus, Riojas participates in tutoring and study groups for her various classes. In addition, every Wednesday night she attends meetings as a member of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes.

Riojas' day usually ends around 9:30 p.m. After being on campus for almost the entire day, she exhaustedly returns home to finish up her homework and other studies.

"I love everything I do," Riojas said. "It is all so crazy and so busy, but it is definitely worth it."

SPORTS IN BRIEF

Federal appeals court will decide Clarett case

NEW YORK (AP) — A federal appeals court will hear the dispute over whether Maurice Clarett can enter the NFL draft less than a week before it takes place.

The NFL tried to convince a three-judge panel of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that it should block Clarett's entry by staying the effect of a lower court judge's ruling he be allowed in the April 24 draft, even though the former Ohio State running back is only two years out of high school.

The appeals panel instead agreed to set oral arguments for April 19 and suggested it might immediately rule whether Clarett can enter the draft.
