NEWS IN BRIEF

Iraq war pilots praise satellite-guided bombs at Pensacola event

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) — Satellite-guided weapons that let U.S. pilots bomb Iraqi targets through a sandstorm and other bad weather last year earned high praise Thursday at the annual Naval Aviation Symposium.

Veterans of Operation Iraqi Freedom also recalled their ability to fly off aircraft carriers when the sandstorm grounded most planes, plus some close calls and a threat by President Bush to fire a top general if Saddam Hussein unleashed weapons of mass destruction.

Naval aviation's finest hour came during the sandstorm that began March 25, 2003, said Capt. David Rogers, operations officer for the Combined Forces Air Component. Superiors told a carrier battle group commander "If you don't fly, people are going to die," although conditions at sea also bordered on unsafe, Rogers said.

Navy pilots bombed tanks and other targets with the satellite-guided weapons although they were unable to see them. Iraqi soldiers then began shedding their uniforms and surrendering.
