Houston airport using fingerprints eye scan matches in security test

By Michael Graczyk
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON - Houston's Bush Intercontinental Airport began participating Tuesday in a federal test program designed to speed frequent flyers through security checkpoints by using fingerprint and eye scan matches on a special ID card.

Houston becomes the third airport in the nation to let passengers who have registered personal information with the Transportation Security Administration to use an express lane that scans their biometric information as they leave ticketing areas for boarding gates.

Minneapolis-St. Paul and Los Angeles started the 90-day test last month. Boston and Washington Reagan are set to join later this month.

"My sort of analogy is, if you're trying to find a needle in a haystack, meaning terrorism in a big group of people, you need to try to make the haystack a little bit smaller," Houston airport director Rick Vacar said. "And I think this program really gets at that point."

After submitting fingerprints and an iris scan to the government, passengers undergo a background check to see if they have outstanding criminal warrants or show up on a terrorist watch list. Officially approved — officials said so far most of the applicants have been approved — they receive an electronic card similar to a credit card.

At the airport, passengers insert the card into a reader at a kiosk. They look into a mirror for an iris scan, which analyzes the individualized features that exist in the colored tissue surrounding the pupil. Then they stick their finger in a sensor that detects the unique ridges and valleys of a person's fingerprint.

If everything matches to the stored data on a person, a message appears on a monitor within a few seconds that says: "Success. You may proceed."

Transportation Security Administration officials hope about 2,000 people at each of the airports participate in the Registered Traveler Program, and will make a decision in November on whether to expand it.

Gretchen Tickle, 61, of Spring, said she's comfortable in giving the government her personal information. She travels extensively for her work with a Houston Catholic church and believes the ID cards are a great idea to speed security checks go faster.
